The heat is on...

2 September 2005

The weather looks set to throw an interesting range of elements at us through the next few days. Initially, we'll see a build-up of heat for many areas followed later on by a thundery breakdown of the very warm, mainly sunny weather.

Most of the United Kingdom will enjoy a fine, warm day on Saturday after a dull start in places. Temperatures will be higher for many on Sunday with 30 °C (86F) expected in the south-east. However, the fine weather will begin to break down from the south-west on Sunday. Forecasters are warning of heavy thunderstorms and torrential downpours bringing the risk of localised flooding for parts of central and northern England by the end of the weekend.

For the latest details for your area, it is advisable to keep a check on the Met Office web site for up-to-date information or see local and national weather forecasts through the media.
